Overall, this book should be on every insurance defense lawyer's bookshelf - if nothing else because the cost is so minimal compared to some of the other sources, and it will be tremendous when a partner yells at you on your first day to determine if there is any way out of a valued policy. This book is high on usability, even though it is low on scope.

The duty to defend is also broader than the duty to indemnify because insurance companies have a legal duty to defend the entire lawsuit, so long as any one claim has the potential to result in indemnity coverage - even if there are other claims that are not covered. For example, if a lawsuit against a policyholder contains 3 claims, only one of which could result in a judgment that would be ...

California has more laws to protect insurance policyholders than any other state in the country. These laws tell insurers what they must, can and cannot do. There are laws made by judges and legislators in Sacramento called “case laws” and “statutes” or “code provisions”. There are laws called “regulations” that are written by the state Department of Insurance. But a law is a law – regardless of fancy labels.
