Matt Cook's Queer Domesticities and John Potvin's Bachelors of a Different Sort reveal how queer men sought out, set up and maintained homes and families in and around London in an age when homosexuality was pathologized by medicine, criminalized by the law and stigmatized in wider society.

Queer Domesticities: Homosexuality and Home Life in ...

In recent years, home and family life has become a key frontier of gay politics. Legislative changes have passed (although not without some stiff resistance), allowing gay couples to adopt (2002), finally repealing Section 28 of the Local Government Act 1988 which prohibited local authorities from promoting 'the acceptability of homosexuality as a pretended family relationship' (2003), and

In Queer Domesticities: Homosexuality and Home Life in Twentieth-Century London (Palgrave, 2014), Matt Cook explores queer men's experiences of home and homemaking in the metropolis. Peering into bedsits in Notting Hill and squats in Brixton, as well as luxurious abodes in the city's more affluent districts, Cook offers a queer history nuanced by class and race.

Queer Domesticities: Matt Cook on Home Life, Family and ...

Abstract In the West, the private sphere of the home is traditionally associated with the heterosexual nuclear family. Through social, cultural, and legal processes, the heterosexual bond has been constructed as central to the family home. Despite these dominant discourses, the home is also a space in which heteronormativity (or the unacknowledged assumption that heterosexuality is the natural ...
